Lindsay Lipman's analytical thinking and love for team building help Aria to promote brand marketing and strategize projects. A rising senior at Washington University in St. Louis, Lindsay studies Psychological & Brain Sciences with a concentration in Cognition in Children.

As a long-time research assistant in the Psychiatry Department at the Washington University School of Medicine, Lindsay has learned to administer testing and analyze complex data. With an interest in the mental processes underlying individual behaviors, she aims to help people reach their performance goals while also considering the fundamental psychology to propel positive growth. In addition, Lindsay has years of experience providing administrative support to senior corporate leaders at various businesses, which has driven her desire to work closely with executive coaching.

Her competitive, hardworking nature stems from playing soccer at a young age to the Varsity Women's Soccer Program at WashU. Through her lifelong involvement in sports, she has always been interested in the different drivers behind individual performance. With her passion for psychology and interest in leadership styles, Lindsay hopes to pursue a clinical psychology path while also coaching in the corporate world.
